Introduction

The Loan Exhibition of Colonial Silver which opened at the Museum on the tenth of May is in a large measure unique, having been collected and arranged to illustrate certain aspects of early American silver-smithing which hitherto have been only touched upon by students and collectors. In the first place, the more familiar Colonial silver of New England and New York has been to a great extent excluded; recent exhibitions in Boston and New York have demonstrated adequately the pre-eminence of these craftsmen and the care with which this particular branch of Colonial silver has been collected, listed, and studied. The present Exhibit, on the other hand, aims to lay special stress upon the work of the early smiths from the more southern provinces, of which Philadelphia was the metropolis, not only to exemplify fully the styles typical of this locality, but also to illustrate the gradual development of these styles. The collection is further limited to examples of silver made during the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries; though a line of demarcation of this sort cannot be strictly adhered to, yet the styles which typify the Nineteenth Century have been kept out of sight. When these limitations are considered it is remarkable that such a large and complete, and yet withal concise, exhibition as the present should have been brought together. Finally, as a background to the Colonial silver, a portrait gallery as it were of the forbears of the American styles, a carefully selected collection of English and European silver is included, that the casual observer as well as the student may see side by side the European prototype and its Colonial expression.

The development of silver-smithing in Philadelphia is one of the minor chords of civic history, and should prove of interest as such, quite apart from its artistic aspects. The craft is essentially the outcome of civilization, the accompaniment of a settled people. The early Quaker settlers in Pennsylvania had neither the time nor the inclination to concern themselves about silverware; their days were occupied fully with husbandry and commerce; their religious tenets made them look with disfavor on all things that might be considered pretentious. Thus it was that of the earliest emigrants from England only a few of the more prosperous brought with them their choicest or most useful pieces of silver. As soon, however, as existence in the Colony became less arduous, the need of a few of the refinements of life and the desire for harmless luxuries were felt, and the more settled life in the growing cities created a demand for silver. The cost of importing, with its attendant trouble, time, and risk, fostered the early Colonial craftsmen, albeit their work was crude—serviceable and adequate, rather than unblemished and artistic. The American craftsmen for the most part chose as models the European styles prevalent at the time they worked, yet in Philadelphia the Quaker influence tended to produce an extreme simplicity of form and workmanship, the direct reflection of the homely Quaker mode of life. In the transition, however, from the original to the Colonial style the forms of silverware—and this applies particularly to the tankards and cans—they lost a certain degree of grace, became squatty and sunken at the base, so much so that this almost indefinable corruption of the English style, when combined with the Quaker simplicity, is characteristic of work from this locality. Two series of outline drawings are appended to emphasize this point more completely. In Pennsylvania and the South the influence of the Dutch style was neither so strong nor so persistent as in New York; yet it was not lacking. In the present Exhibition there are two beakers which illustrate the effect of the Dutch; one, made in America in the early Seventeenth Century; the other, almost the exact prototype of the first, made in Cologne in the Dutch style about 1610, and lent by Christ Church. The similarity of the two is striking.

TYPES OF PHILADELPHIA CANS

The first name on the long list of distinguished and successful Philadelphia silver-smiths is that of Caesar Ghiselin, a Huguenot refugee who came from England only a few years after William Penn. His work when measured by later standards is inclined to appear crude, almost unfinished, and yet there is in its graceful simplicity a charm peculiarly distinctive. Ghiselin died in Philadelphia in 1733, but even before his death a new generation of smiths was rising to succeed him. Francis Richardson, who, according to an advertisement in the Pennsylvania Gazette for September, 1736, lived

'at the corner of Letitia Court in Market-Street' and 'made, sold, clean'd and mended reasonably very neat Clocks and Jacks' is the first of a name which stands so high in the annals of Philadelphia silver-smithing. For a full century Francis Richardson, his son Joseph, and his grandsons Joseph and Nathaniel stamped their name upon silverware that is as fine as any produced in Colonial America. Another name which ranks with that of Richardson in the story of the craft in Philadelphia is that of Syng. John Syng came to Philadelphia from England in 1714, worked at silver-smithing for twenty years and died in 1739, leaving his son Philip to succeed him in the trade. Philip was the most distinguished member of the family, a close friend of Franklin, first Master of the Mint, first Treasurer of the Philosophical Society, and interested in all movements which furthered the welfare of his city. He also had a son, Philip, who plied the trade of silver-smith but died some years before his father. In this Exhibition there are a number of pieces of silver which are the work of this family, and the high standard of excellence they maintained through three generations is surprising. Up to the beginning of the Revolution the Syngs and the Richardsons were the outstanding silver craftsmen in Philadelphia, but with the growth of the city and the national importance which it attained, a score of new smiths came, bringing with them new styles and graceful variations of the old. At the same time the Classical Revival of Wedgwood and Flaxman in England was reflected in the Colonial silver. The urn shape was quickly adopted in Philadelphia and from the large number of pieces in this form which are today extant we may judge of its wide popularity. The Philadelphians added to the original form, however, the delicately pierced gallery, a peculiarity, as far as it is known, which typifies the work from this locality of the final quarter of the Eighteenth Century. This period and the early years of the next century marked the heyday of the craft in Philadelphia; not only were there more silver-smiths working at that time in this city than in any other in the country, but also they were turning out the best American work. Richard Humphreys with his excellently proportioned and thoroughly satisfying tankards and cans; Christian Wiltberger, John McMullin, and Joseph Lownes with their artistic tea and coffee services, John LeTelier and Abraham DuBois with their graceful and refined sugar bowls and cream pitchers, these were the Philadelphia craftsmen whose work was of the highest order, and who are today recognized as the leaders of their time. And throughout all their work there is a lack of sophistry and of flamboyance which is particularly pleasing, an inherent expression of the ever-constant Quaker desire for simplicity which has been reflected to a certain degree in all the silver produced in Philadelphia since the earliest days of the craft.

The beginning of the Nineteenth Century saw a sudden decline in the art of silver-smithing in Philadelphia. Two causes militated to reduce the city's pre-eminence. In the first place the epidemics of yellow fever, the most severe in 1793 and 1798, proved especially disastrous to all craftsmen; many silver-smiths died of the fever, many through fear left to establish themselves in other cities. In the second place, with the removal of the Capital to Washington at the beginning of the new century and the consequent decline of Philadelphia's national importance, there was less encouragement to the silver-smiths to ply their trade here. The factors which might have attracted new smiths were gone, and the survivors of the epidemics soon died out, and so, from this time forward the annals of Philadelphia silver-smithing became dull. When, therefore, the scope of this Exhibition was limited chiefly to the Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries it was not without reason.

The above is a thumbnail sketch of the history of the craft in Philadelphia. One point alone remains to be considered, and that is why in Pennsylvania and the Southern Provinces less silver was made; why less was in everyday household use than in New England. The comparative stability of the currency in these two regions accounts for this fact. In New England, the unstable paper money which was being issued continually, and which was received at varying discounts in different localities, made silver the only constant, and hence most desirable, form of money. Yet the householder preferred to change his silver hoardings into some form which might be safe and at the same time useful. No better way was afforded than having his coin melted and recast in articles for his table, which he could use every day and, if the need arose, convert into ready money with the assurance of incurring little or no loss. Consequently, a large amount of the silver made in Colonial New England represented the family fortune, rather than a special and local taste for silverware. In Pennsylvania, on the contrary, where commerce and trade were on a sound footing and where but little paper currency was in circulation, the householder found no need to take such steps; his silver coin if deposited in a bank brought him a satisfactory rate of interest, and could at any time be withdrawn for use. So the Pennsylvanian did not visit his silver-smith with his savings for recasting, and for this reason there was less silver in household use in the Southern provinces than in New England. It is an interesting point inasmuch as it demonstrates how closely interwoven were various threads of Colonial life.

Many of the pieces in this Loan Collection are of historical interest; chief among these are the Markoe and the Powel standard-tops, lent by the First City Troop. The former was on the standard carried in the battle of Princeton and is the work of an unidentified maker with the initials "D. S."; the latter was the work of John Myers of Philadelphia. The baptismal bowl, the flagon and the beaker which Philip Syng made for Christ Church are also included in the Exhibit, as well as a tankard which belonged to Benjamin Franklin, made by Elias Boudinot, now the property of the Rivinus family. Another tankard is individually interesting since tradition says that during the Revolution it was filled with gold pieces and buried in the garden to hide it and its contents from the predatory fingers of the Hessian soldiery. There is in the collection also the small silver bowl, made by Philip Syng for Franklin's sister, and inscribed "D. Evans to S. Franklin." The Historical Society has lent two quaint and unusual pieces: A silver gorget and the Indian Peace Medal of 1793, both made by Joseph Richardson, and used by the Quakers and by Congress for presentation to friendly Indian chiefs.

Another unique piece on exhibition is the large standing salt-cellar made by John Edwards and John Allen of Boston.

Among the European silver in the Exhibition the outstanding pieces are a caudle cup supposed to be the finest example of this sort in America, a representative group of pieces by Paul Lamerie of London, and a rare Irish Potato-ring. The Bruton Parish Silver is exceedingly beautiful and of rare pedigree, having been longer in the possession of the Parish to which it was given originally than any other Church Silver in America.

In conclusion it may be said that the catalogue which follows aims to give, as well as a concise description of each piece on exhibition, some information about each American maker. For this purpose the early Directories have been searched for information, and extracts from the Journals of the day have been included; for it is interesting to know that the silver-smith whose work we admire was considered by his contemporaries "a gentleman whose private virtues, and public spirit, justly claimed the friendship, esteem and confidence of his fellow-citizens."

I am greatly indebted and take this occasion to thank Mr. Hollis French for the list prepared by the Walpole Society, Mr. Maurice Brix for the list of Philadelphia silversmiths, Sir Charles Jackson for the marks of English goldsmiths, and Mr. Alfred C. Prime for his untiring work for the research committee of the Museum, upon whom I have drawn for much of the information in this catalogue.

The SYNG FAMILY

Philip Syng, the Elder, born in Ireland in 1676. Came to America 1714. His residence in Philadelphia was only temporary, near the Market Place. He subsequently moved to Annapolis where he died 1739, aged sixty-three.

His son, Philip Syng, Jr., also a silversmith, was born in Ireland in 1703. He came to America with his father and made a permanent residence in Philadelphia. He was a member of Benjamin Franklin's Junto, and when Franklin founded the Library Company of Philadelphia, Philip Syng was made a director. He was appointed Junior Grand Warden of the Masonic Lodge by Franklin in 1749. Mr. Syng was one of original trustees of Public Academy in Philadelphia which afterwards grew into the University of Pennsylvania. The electrical contrivance with which Franklin made his experiments was made by this Syng. He was one of the founders of the American Philosophical Society and was elected its first Treasurer in 1768. When the Colony in Schuylkill was founded, Philip Syng, Jr.'s name was eleventh on the roll of the original members. He made the silver inkstand in 1753 which the Provincial Assembly of Pennsylvania purchased, and from which the Declaration of Independence was signed and the Constitution of the United States. He died in 1789, at the age of eighty-five.

Philip Syng, 3d, silversmith, was born in 1733. He was unmarried and died in 1760, thirty years before his father's death.
